Ten down clues (2D-11D) are playing a game if you can bear to believe it.

Their answers extend into the shaded area at the top of the grid, but those letters don't even spell anything! Instead of entering them there, the answers drop these letters, at which point they float their way down to the bottom shaded area. But in the middle, the letters get mixed up, arriving in a different order, making new words at the bottom of the grid. None of those new entries are plural nouns, though one is Latin, one is capitalized, and one is usually a two-word phrase but appears as a compound word in dictionary.com.

See these letters safely to their destination to find out the name of the game being played.

Eleven across clues are waiting for their turn, but they play slightly differently. Each of these clues has an extra word that also must be dropped before the clue can be solved. All of the first letters followed by all of the last letters of the extra words, in clue order, will explain why no one's arguing about this game, and describes the grid in more detail.
